BAGRAM, Afghanistan — In an effort to flush drugs and contraband out of this theater of operations, one dog and his handler take on the task alone.

They are the only team in this theater qualified to sniff out narcotics. Sgt. Laurence Gilbert, narcotics dog handler, 163rd Military Police Detachment, Fort Campbell, Ky. K-9 unit and 85-pound German shepherd, Johnny, have taken on the task to make sure no illegal narcotics are brought into the camps on Bagram.

“It is a huge responsibility,” said Staff Sgt. Michael Sytsma, kennel master, 35th Military Police Detachment, Fort Gordon, Ga. “There is a lot of area this one team has to cover.”

The team has been on the ground since

ANA, U.S. soldiers work together in Madr Valley

MADR VALLEY, Afghanistan — Soldiers of the 3rd Kandak (battalion), Afghan National Army were instrumental in recovering part of Afghanistan’s cultural history.

3rd Kandak soldiers along with U.S. Special Forces went into the village of Daste Safed to investigate reports of two people suspected of being falsely imprisoned in a house in the area.

In past weeks, information had been circulating around the area of Madr that disputes between artifact dealers in Daste

Safed and a village to the north over money resulted in warnings that anyone passing through the village of Daste Safed would be imprisoned.

When the Kandak soldiers arrived at the site, the person who owned the house was not present. While conducting a routine sweep of the premises looking for weapons they came across a cave in the back yard where three crates thought to contain weapons were discovered. When opened, the contents were identified as national relics.

“ANA soldiers with the assistance of U.S. forces immediately took control of the artifacts, inventoried them and took responsibility for transportation of them to Kabul,” said Capt. Vincent Martinelli, commander of SF Forces currently responsible for training the 3rd Kandak.

“This mission showed yet another example of the professionalism of the Afghan National Army,” he said.

Britain proposes deadline for Iraq

UNITED NATIONS — British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw told the U.N. Security Council on Friday that an amended version of the new draft resolution on Iraq would set a deadline for Iraqi compliance with the council's demand for disarmament.

A draft copy of the amendment obtained by CNN sets a March 17 deadline for Iraq to comply fully with previous Security Council disarmament resolutions.

Unless the United Nations decides that Iraq has shown "full, unconditional, immediate cooperation" on or before that date, the resolution reads, Iraq "will have failed to take the final opportunity" to disarm.

A U.S. official said a Security Council vote would likely take place Tuesday, but a British source said no date had been set.

Straw announced the proposal during the Security Council's discussion of reports issued by chief U.N. weapons inspectors Hans Blix and Mohamed ElBaradei.

Both inspectors reported progress and told the council that they would need more time to verify whether Iraq was complying.

The inspectors' presentations did not appear to sway the permanent, veto-wielding members of the divided Security Council, with the United States and Britain in favor of giving Iraq a deadline and France, Russia and China against it.

France, Russia and China want more time for further U.N. inspections and are critical of U.S. threats to use military force to disarm Iraq.

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said he was pleased to hear of cooperation from the Iraqis but "sorry" to see that the cooperation had come grudgingly and "primarily under the threat of force."

U.S. can't confirm arrest

WASHINGTON — A Pakistani provincial official said Friday that two of Osama bin Laden's sons were among those captured in a U.S.-led raid in southwestern Afghanistan, but U.S. and local officials are disputing the report.

Earlier Friday, The Associated Press and Reuters news services quoted Sanaullah

Zehri, Pakistan's home minister in the southwestern province of Baluchistan, as saying that two men, believed to be bin Laden's sons, were arrested in the Rabat area, where the borders of Afghanistan, Pakistan and Iran meet.

Zehri later told CNN that an exchange of fire across the border in Afghanistan resulted in casualties and arrests, but that he did not know if any of those held were relatives of bin Laden.

The wire services also quoted Zehri as saying seven other al-Qaida members were killed in the raid.

White House spokesman Ari Fleischer played down the claims, saying: "We have no information to substantiate that report."

Pyongyang says the current annual U.S.-S. Korea war games are prelude to a military strike.

N. Korea may test 2nd missile

WASHINGTON — North Korea has issued a notice to mariners that indicates it plans to conduct an at-sea weapons test, possibly as early as this weekend.

U.S. officials tell CNN they believe North Korea will conduct another test of its KN-01 short-range anti-ship missile, which is under development.

South Korea's Ministry for Defense reportedly backed up the U.S. information on Saturday.

"We are aware that they (North Korea) are preparing to fire a missile, probably between this weekend and early next week," a South Korean defense ministry spokesman told South Korea's Yonhap News Agency.

The agency quoted a high-ranking ministry official as saying the South had noticed the North's preparations from their moves such as blocking ship traffic in the Sea of Japan, also known as the East Sea.

The announcement came hours after U.S. President George W. Bush re-emphasized U.S. demands for multilateral talks to discuss North Korea's nuclear program, despite Pyongyang's repeated calls for direct talks with Washington.

The KN-01 is the same missile that was tested several weeks ago and the test is expected to also occur over the Sea of Japan in the same area as the last test.

More Air Force cadets speak out

DENVER, Colo. — Sharon Fullilove dreamed of flying fighter jets, while Jessica Brakey wanted to attend a school with discipline and honor. Both hoped the Air Force Academy would be a place where they would learn how to serve their country.

Both say their dreams were shattered when they were raped by upperclassmen at the academy.

They kept silent for months, worried that if they reported the assaults, their military careers would be over.

"People have to understand, this is nothing like a normal college," said Fullilove, 21, whose own mother is an Air Force colonel stationed at the academy.

"Upperclassmen are your superiors. You have to listen to them and obey their rules. You can't tell them to get out. I didn't feel safe," she added.

The Air Force has identified at least 54 allegations of rape or sexual assault at the academy outside Colorado Springs over the past 10 years, and officials say there are probably many more cadets who have not come forward.

"What frightens me most is the climate that has affected so many others who have not come forward," Air Force Secretary James Roche said Thursday on Capitol Hill. "While we have seen, whatever the number is, 25, 50, there are probably a hundred more that we do not see."

At the academy Friday, Air Force Chief of Staff Gen. John Jumper said he wants to root out any sexual predators still at the academy or in the Air Force.

Food service enhanced for troop's morale

BAGRAM, Afghanistan – Around 1230Z everyday, a line forms outside the dining facility as troops wait in the cold, wind and rain for what they have been looking forward to all day — a hot meal.

The Department of the Army's food service department is aware that hot chow is one of the main morale boosters for deployed troops. As a result, they are constantly enhancing food options and quality based on what soldiers want.

"When I joined the Army years ago, the C rations we were issued didn't have much soldier input and were very basic," said Chief Warrant Officer 4 Azzalee Brown, food service advisor, logistics, Combined Joint Task Force-180.

"Now, DA conducts surveys at different military installations throughout the country to find out what soldiers would like to see in meals. This is why the Meal Ready to Eat containers now carry candy, cookies and other things the younger generation enjoys," she said.

Even though there have been changes made to food service in the past few decades, some things remain the same in a deployed environment.

"It is illegal for us to buy and procure meat and dairy products from unapproved food sources. In a place like Afghanistan, you can't just go to the store to buy meat or dairy items like you can in the States," said Brown.

"All of the food served in the DFACs here are from an approved source packaged in the States. Then they are sent here by rail or air. The rations being served are called Utilized Group Rations H&S, which are heated and served to the soldiers — much like the old T rations," she added.

"Another UGR commonly used in deployments are UGR-As," said Brown. "This includes perishable, frozen-type entrees to provide the luxury of an A ration meal to the troops. The meal comes with pre-cooked in country and then served."

To enhance the UGR meals, meat items are offered with the regular UGR meal.

The line item meat item is a supplement to the meal and is used to offer soldiers a choice to the regular meat items packaged with the UGRs.

"Steaks, shrimp and lobsters on Fridays is now possible due to the line A ration," said Brown. "This enables the food service worker to cook and prepare meat items from scratch in the DFAC kitchen."

Along with these new menu changes, improvements are also being made to the dining facilities.

"The new South DFAC is almost ready to open and is complete with state-of-the-art kitchen equipment and marble floors," said Brown. "Another one will be built for the North side and the DFAC in Dragon City will be renovated," she explained.

Brown said the changes the food service department are making are positive and are comparable to commercial food service facilities to support our troops.

"Every soldier I talk to says the two things that boost their morale the most are mail and good chow," said Brown. "Even though they can't be home with their families right now, a good home cooked meal here may be just what they need to brighten their day."

"When I joined the Army years ago, the C rations we were issued didn't have much soldier input ... Now, DA conducts surveys at different military installations throughout the country to find out what soldiers would like to see in meals.

Communication key to marriage during deployment

By Pfc. Debralee P. Crankshaw
11th Public Affairs Detachment

BAGRAM, Afghanistan – "Any normal problems couples have are amplified by 1,000 when a soldier deploys," said Capt. Scott Babe, psychiatrist, combat stress control, 1835th Medical Detachment, Denver, Colo.

Deployed soldiers have a lot to worry about, but they're not the only ones involved. A soldier's spouse is an important part of their life and must deal with a deployment just as they do.

According to Babe, the key to keeping the relationship strong during a deployment, is communication.

"A soldier should keep in contact, but not be overly involved. You want your family to know you are around, but you shouldn't try to solve all the problems," said Babe. "Sometimes just listening to the problem is the most important thing you can do."

Chaplain (Maj.) Tom Roltsch, 48th Combat Support Hospital and Task Force-44 chaplain, agrees.

"Soldiers should write home and tell them that they miss them. It tells them that their job is not more important than their family," said Roltsch. "Soldiers are very limited in what they can do to help their family here. A lot of soldiers are the problem solvers in the family. They e-mail home and find out the problems there then they try to fix things at home and their problems here."

Some soldiers feel the distance caused by deployment will help alleviate their problems, when really it only makes things harder.

"Soldiers think distance will help their problems, but they just get worse. All they do is add another problem," said Col. Paula Walker, commander, 1835th.

Babe suggests soldiers try to understand a deployment is not easy for their spouse. They take on an independent role and that can be difficult for them and the soldier.

"Things are changing at home. Although things are difficult here, it's also difficult there. Some spouses feel guilty for complaining, but it is hard for them, as well as the December and have done approximately 20 health and welfare inspections. The most recent was Wednesday. Though Gilbert said he doesn't see Bagram as a large problem, he and Johnny have found drugs on several different inspections.

"In Afghanistan, hashish is the biggest problem — it is cheap and easy to come by," said Gilbert. "Afghans will readily sell to soldiers."

Hashish is a derivative of marijuana, but it has a gummy consistency and leaves a heavy oil residue. It is easily recognizable, and is generally sold in sticks.

"Hash is as easy to get as a candy bar," said Sytsma.

It is Gilbert and Johnny's job to prevent the substance from being used or owned. They do this through their health and welfare inspections.

The inspections are random and done when a commander calls upon them, Gilbert said. Each tent is thoroughly searched by the trained nose of Johnny under the direction of Gilbert. A dog's sense of smell is much more keen than a human's and as soon as Johnny enters an area, he knows if there is something there — it is just a matter of finding it. The process takes only minutes. Once he does he immediately sits and waits for Gilbert.

"I am basically there to 'present' to Johnny any areas that he misses or may not sniff on his own, and once he has alerted me to something I search and find exactly where it is," Gilbert said. The MPs will not dig through belongings until Johnny has positively alerted them to something. His reward is a chew toy that Gilbert always carries with him.

Johnny is trained to sniff out five different narcotic substances. All drug dogs are trained at Lackland Air Force Base, San Antonio, Texas. It is an intensive 90-day training where the dogs learn how to work with soldiers on sniffing drugs and patrolling. Once they complete training they are ready to go to work at a military installation.

It is then that they meet their new handlers. "Once we get a new dog we have to go through a 45-60 day familiarization. That is where we learn the dog and the dog learns us," Gilbert said. The familiarization period is there to certify both the handler and the dog. Once they become certified they are ready to take on missions.

To keep the required 90 percent accuracy, Gilbert and Johnny must go through at least quarterly training. Training kits are ordered from the Naval Criminal Investigative Service.

"We try to make the training as realistic as possible," said Gilbert. "We try to think like a person who would have the substance and ask ourselves, 'If we were trying to hide this, where would we put it?'" said Gilbert. The object of the training is not to make it too hard for the dog, but to challenge him.

According to Gilbert, the longest training will last is two hours. "We want the dog to find the substance and we want them to do it quickly," he said.

Since the conventional training aids cannot be shipped here, Gilbert and Johnny use sticks of hashish. During their inspections, the MP who is accompanying the team will randomly place the sticks. This serves two purposes; one is to keep Johnny interested in the inspection and the other is for training.

"It is important to keep the dog sharp," said Gilbert. "If we go three months without training, we will no longer be certified."

Gilbert has been a dog handler for about two years and was drawn to the task by observing other teams. His first experience was in 1997 when he was stationed at Fort Belvoir, Va.

"I saw a specialist on patrol with his dog and he was on his own. I had respect for that and that is what I decided what I wanted to do," he said.

When it came time for Gilbert to reenlist, he did to be a dog handler. Now Gilbert is on his own. "It's just me and my dog."

These two bowls, found in a cave in Daste Safed by Afghan National Army soldiers, could date back as far as 2,000-3,000 years ago. These relics are thought to have been made and used by Buddhist priests living in the area.

After the artifacts were taken into custody, they were brought back to Firebase Romero and put on display for local Afghan media and political and military officials.

“This find shows the people of Bamian that Daste Safed is a very old city and was used quite extensively by the Buddhists many years ago,” said Col. Aminullah, 3rd Kandak commander.

soldier,” said Babe.

Babe and Roltsch agree the soldier should keep in contact so their spouse won’t feel abandoned.

“Soldiers should try to communicate – call every day or send an e-mail every day. Just let them know you care,” said Roltsch.

“A simple thing as saying, ‘I look forward to coming home’ can help the relationship. The spouse is afraid of seeming boring to the soldier when they redeploy,” said Babe.

If a soldier is having problems with things back home he should not let it fester. Walker recommends speaking to a professional.

“If you are having problems with your spouse, seek out a professional to talk to – a chaplain or combat stress (counselor). Your friends will give you as many different opinions as you have friends,” said Walker. “Sometimes we will show soldiers options they never knew they had.”

According to Roltsch, this deployment is not as hard on soldiers and their spouses as others are.

“It’s easier for soldiers deployed here and their spouses because they believe in this mission,” said Roltsch. “It helps that they are proud to be here.”

years ago.

“These artifacts quite possibly date back as far as two to three thousand years,” Aminullah said.

In years past, national treasures like those found in Daste Safed were taken by Taliban supporters to be sold on the black market. “People supporting the Taliban and al-Qaida have spent many years taking our cultural artifacts out of this country to sell in Pakistan to other countries,” said Muhammad Rahim Aliyar, Governor of Bamian.

“I appreciate the soldiers who recovered these artifacts. It is obvious that they were well trained by the U.S. forces here. They work well together,” he said.

While the ANA’s mission in Bamian has primarily been disarming the region, political and military officials agree that the recovery of these artifacts lends even more credibility to the ANA because they are essentially giving back to the people.

“This discovery is important not only for the Kandak but for all the people of Afghanistan,” said Aliyar.

While it is speculated that there are other artifacts in the area, getting to the locations where Buddhist priests might have lived is hampered by the many mines still in the area.

According Aminullah that will not deter his troops from recovering more artifacts in the future.

“ANA soldiers and officers are very proud of the fact that we found these artifacts and will work day and night to recover others,” he said.

Aliyar added, “The first step starts here.”

‘Attention to the Colors’

It was approaching dusk and it was time to get into formation. The three Military Policemen from the 118th Military Police Company, Fort Bragg, N.C. assembled and marched to the Joint Operations Center flags. Their posture rigid with each facing movement. Their freshly-starched and pressed Desert Camouflaged Uniforms crunched with each step. “Attention to the colors,” announced Spc. Jonathon Wilson, 118th MP Co. It is the company’s duty to take down the Afghanistan, Combined Joint Task Force-180 and American flags each day. Each take a turn lowering a flag while the other two stand at attention. The custom concludes with folding and passing of each flag. The three MPs assemble back into formation and march off. As the sun sets, the formation leader securely holds the American flag in his arms.

FREEDOM'S VOICES

Is it real, or is it the matrix?

Just my Opinion

Spc. Rick Robinson
11th Public Affairs
Detachment

No one can explain what the Matrix is. You have to see it for yourself.

The gospel according to Morpheus.

Where are we? The simple answer is Afghanistan. But are we really here?

Think about it. Have there not been times when your days ran together and you couldn't tell Tuesday night from Thursday morning?

For those of you who have adjusted your body to operate on a Zulu clock, have there not been times when you looked at your watch and didn't know if the sun was on the way up or down? This could be a busy schedule throwing off your sense of time - or it could be a glitch in the Matrix.

How many of your days are exactly the same — wake up, do PT, shower, eat, work, sleep and then do it all again the next day.

Think about how relative time is. To look at a calendar and see how much time you've spent here makes it seem as if time is moving at warp speed. Even looking ahead at how much time you are supposed to have left seems insignificant compared to the time that has elapsed.

But think — don't look at a calendar or clock. Six months is a while, and yet, it isn't.

Why is this? What causes this phenomenon? The Matrix.

If you haven't experienced this yet, and are comfortable in your new surroundings, then you took the blue pill. But, if you realize that the days are the same as the nights, the weekends don't differ from the weekdays, and the moon can be in two places at the same time (12:00L and 12:00Z), then you have taken the red pill.

If someone were to ask about your first night in Afghanistan, you might reply with "I remember it as if were yesterday."

With all the time you have spent here, is it really possible to remember that one night so vividly? Six months is a long time, and memories have a tendency to fade. The answer is simple. You remember it like yesterday because it was yesterday. The many days and weeks that have passed were all figments of your imagination. The monotony is deliberate; it makes the dreams go by much faster.

The white rabbit has led you to this column. You now have a decision to make. Do you take the blue pill or the red pill? The blue pill will make you oblivious to the concepts of time and space.

You'll think you haven't been here that long and won't think you're as far from home as you are. For those daring individuals that will venture away from the familiar and take the red pill, to you I say, "Welcome to the real world."

In a nutshell, six months isn't long at all. Suck it up.

Educate yourself before firearm purchase

By Spc. James Merrill
CJTF-180 Legal Assistance NCOIC

BAGRAM, Afghanistan — While deployed to Afghanistan there are plenty of opportunities to purchase souvenirs for friends and family back in the States. Some of the most popular souvenirs are antique firearms. They are excellent keepsakes and will provide memories of where you served for years to come.

However, there are certain restrictions that apply and documents needed to take these weapons back to the United States.

Antique firearms do not fall within the guidelines of the Federal Gun Control Act. So antique firearms may be imported into the States without obtaining an import license. These weapons purchased with personal funds and transported to the U.S. must be intended solely for personal use. Personal use includes presentation as a gift, but the firearm may not be resold. Individuals desiring to import the firearm bear the burden of proving the weapon meets the definition of an antique firearm. Whether you intend to hand carry or mail your firearm, you should complete an affidavit indicating that the weapon falls under the antique firearm definition.

Normally the introduction, purchase, possession or sale of privately owned firearms is prohibited by General Order Number 1-A, however, this prohibition has been waived for antique firearms and replicas legally obtained in Afghanistan. The definition of an antique firearm is any firearm manufactured during or before 1898 that has a matchlock, flintlock, percussion cap or similar type of ignition system.

Also, any replica of a weapon described in the previous statement is included in the definition, as long as the replica is not redesigned to use rim fire or conventional center-fire fixed ammunition, or fire ammunition that is readily available or manufactured in the United States.

This includes any weapon that can be converted to fire fixed ammunition by replacing the barrel, bolt, breechblock, or any combination.

Before attempting to take an antique firearm to the United States an individual should consult the Legal Assistance Office, the Bagram Military Police Customs Office and the Post Office. Legal Assistance can provide an affidavit for you to swear that your weapon is an antique, along with a memorandum that waives General Order Number 1-A in regards to antique firearms.

An antique firearm can be a lasting reminder of your time in Afghanistan and an heirloom that is passed on to your descendants for generations. Following some simple steps, will make passing through customs easy. For further questions, stop by the Legal Assistance Office located in Motel 6 or call 318-231-4603.

Women's History Month

It began as a single week and as a local event in 1978 in Sonoma County, Calif., who sponsored the event to promote the teaching of women's history. The week of March 8 was selected to include International Women's Day. In 1981 Congress passed a resolution making the week a national celebration, and in 1987 expanded it to the full month of March.

The National Museum of Women in the Arts, in Washington, D.C., is the only museum in the world that focuses on the achievements of women artists. The museum's permanent collection includes more than 3,000 works of art — from sculpture to paintings to photography — and covers the 16th through 21st centuries.

Bagram to host Texas A&M "Muster"

Former Students of Texas A&M University will assemble at Bagram Air Base April 21 for the annual Texas Aggie Muster in honor of all Texas Aggies who have passed away within the last year. The ceremony will begin at 1500Z at the Task Force Tiger, 229th Aviation Regiment, briefing tent (the tent is on the southern side of the hangar) in the Coalition Task Force-82 Compound. Texas Aggie Muster welcomes all former and current students, their families, and friends of Texas A&M University.

The tradition spans over a century and will be observed in more than 350 locations around the world. Bagram will be 351st. These Muster gatherings are held in many unique places ranging from foxholes during World War II to ballrooms and steakhouses today.

Country hit inspired in Afghanistan sparks controversy

By Lee Elder

U.S. Army Recruiting Command PAO

NASHVILLE, Tenn. — A December trip to Afghanistan gave country singer Darryl Worley a renewed appreciation for America's Army along with a chance to see the frontlines of the nation's War on Terror. It also provided him with the inspiration for what might be a new hit song.

A DreamWorks recording artist, Worley released the single "Have You Forgotten?" on Feb. 24. The song is already taking off on country radio, but that's not why Worley said he penned the song along with Wynn Varble.

"It was on my heart to do something to honor those guys since I got home," Worley said. "I needed a way to say, 'This is what I experienced.'"

"I'm on a mission. I knew I had to come back and do this."

Worley said he hopes the song will make Americans better appreciate their Army.

"Our soldiers are the best," Worley said. "They do great things every day that people never know about, but they don't care."

"I just thought it was time somebody spoke out for them."

Worley, 38, had never been overseas prior to his USO tour to Afghanistan. He said the trip he made with Sgt. Maj. of the Army Jack L. Tilley and others gave him a new sense for the rigors of military life.

"The whole experience completely changed my life," Worley said. "That's what this is all about."

"It's all about those soldiers."

The song's bridge pays homage to the soldiers serving in harm's way. It says, "I've been there with the soldiers who've gone away to war/And you can bet that they remember just what they're fighting for."

The song is also very outspoken. It has even been called a pro-war song.

It's a charge Worley flatly denies. He said he was concerned that the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks were starting to fade in the public's memory.

"I don't want to forget it as long as we live," Worley said. "When we forget about these things, that's when we become vulnerable again."

"We can't get too comfortable and let our guard down. There's quite a few people who would like to see the United States crumble and fall."

Worley said the song was not aimed at those who oppose U.S. action in Iraq. He acknowledged the song could be a risky career move.

"I'm not doing this to come against other people," Worley explained. "I'm not trying to create a huge controversy. At the same time, I'm not trying to be politically correct."

"It's a message people need to hear. I don't think we accomplish anything unless go out on a limb and take some risks."

The week since the new single was re-

Country Western musician Darryl Worley performs for Bagram soldiers during his December visit to the base. Worley's visit to troops in the Central Command theater prompted his writing the song "Have You Forgotten."

"Have You Forgotten"

Verse 1

*I hear people saying we don't need this war
I say there's some things worth fighting for
What about our freedom and this piece of ground
We didn't get to keep 'em by backing down
They say we don't realize the mess we're getting in*

Before you start your preaching let me ask you this my friend

Chorus 1

*Have you forgotten how it felt that day
To see your homeland under fire
And her people blown away
Have you forgotten when those towers fell
We had neighbors still inside going through a living hell
And you say we shouldn't worry about bin Laden
Have you forgotten*

Verse 2

*They took all the footage off my T.V.
Said it's too disturbing for you and me
It'll just breed anger that's what the experts say*

*If it was up to me I'd show it everyday
Some say this country's just out looking for a fight*

After 9/11 man I'd have to say that's right

Repeat chorus

Bridge

*I've been there with the soldiers
Who've gone away to war
And you can bet that they remember
Just what they're fighting for*

Chorus 3

*Have you forgotten all the people killed
Some went down like heroes in that Pennsylvania field*

*Have you forgotten about our Pentagon
All the loved ones that we lost and those left to carry on*

*Don't you tell me not to worry about bin Laden
Have you forgotten*

Former firefighting Marine risks self to save others

Firefighters worked dilligently to extinguish the Kandahar Post Exchange blaze. PX employees, preparing to open the store, didn't know there was a fire until Marine Lance Cpl. Jai L. Le pounded on locked doors until they answered.

KANDAHAR, Afghanistan — The Post Exchange was burning down and the people inside didn't even know their building was on fire. The front doors were locked and the Exchange wasn't going to open for a few hours, but one Marine kept pounding on the doors until somebody finally answered.

"I told her the building was on fire," said Lance Cpl. Jai L. Le, ground radio repairman, Marine Air Control Squadron 4, Okinawa, Japan. "She told me it wasn't and acted like I was lying to her. I told her it was on fire again and she looked back and saw smoke coming into the room behind her."

Le then ran into the burning building and helped try to put out the fire with fire extinguishers, but was unsuccessful so he made sure the building was empty before he left.

The Air Force fire department here arrived on scene and started looking for volunteers. Le stepped up.

He relied on training he received as a volunteer fire fighter in Louisiana to lead other volunteers with no training. He directed his small crew until the fire was out and the only thing left to do was check the scene for hot spots that still needed to be put out.

"The majority of the people helping out hadn't had any training," said Le, a native of Raceland, La. "I don't have much, but it was enough to know what to do and what not to do."

While he was fighting the fire, his unit was getting a 100 percent accountability of personnel. Le wasn't accounted for so his unit began searching the post for him. The last anyone saw of him was at the gym during martial arts training. A soldier that knew him told him his unit was looking for him.

"They need me over here right now, can you give them a call and tell them where I am?" said Le. But, "... apparently nobody called because my sergeant major showed up and asked me where I had been and what I was doing. He just wanted to make sure I was OK."

Le found out later that he had been fighting the fire for three or four hours, but didn't realize it had been that long. Le said he "just remembers it happening so quick."

Le said he wasn't trying to be a hero, he just did what he thought should be done, what he figures any Marine would have done.

The other Marines in his unit give him a lot of good-natured ribbing, but they are still proud of him.

"The next day I walked into work and somebody said 'Oh look, the hero is here,'" said Le who is also a unit instructor for the Marine Corps Martial Arts Program. "Then they put me in the middle of everyone and played 'You're My Hero' by Whitney Houston."

Le's non-commissioned officer in charge told him he was being put in for a medal, but didn't say which one.

The medal isn't as important to Le as lending a helping hand and getting a thank you from it.

"Today I ran into the lady who opened the door and I asked her how she was doing," said Le. "She said thanks and that she was fine. She told me the girls from the barber shop were fine too."

PX to celebrate anniversary

Bagram's Post Exchange will celebrate their year anniversary here Tuesday.

The PX will have coffee and cake to celebrate the anniversary. Additionally, throughout the day anniversary specials will be offered.

There will be gift certificate drawings and giveaways of video games and movies. The PX will also offer a VIP pass in the drawings which will allow the recipient to cut in the front of the line. They will be offered for one month, two months and the duration of the tour. The passes are non-transferable.

For thousands of years, Afghanistan was a crossroad for trade from India, Iran, and Central Asia. As a result, many treasures and artifacts have been discovered and collected. The Kabul Museum, housed the most comprehensive record of Central Asian history. Many of its pieces have been dated as far back as pre-historic times. One of the museum's largest displays, was the magnificent Bagram Collection. Discovered in 1939, by archaeologists excavating a Kushan fort, it contained an amazing 1,800 pieces from India, Rome, Greece, Egypt, and Central Asia. The Kabul Museum also had one of the largest displays of Greek and Roman coins found near Kabul. This collection was a historical treasure, as it contained coins from numerous civilizations dating from the 8th century B.C. to the late 19th century.

These treasures and many others were tragically lost when the Kabul Museum was bombed in 1993. At first, only the upper galleries suffered losses and looting. The remaining artifacts, were transferred to lower leveled, steel-door vaults. In 1994, the UN attempted to stop the looting by repairing the doors, and bricking up the windows. Disappointingly, these attempts failed, and looters continued to plunder 90 percent of the museum's collections. Both private collectors and antique dealers from as far away as Tokyo, have purchased stolen museum pieces. Looted artifacts have shown up all over the world, and they bring in large sums of money to the criminals.

These two bowls were found in Daste Safed by Afghan National Army soldiers. They are believed to be national artifacts dating back 2,000-3,000. (Photo by Spc. Worley Smith, 109th Mobile Public Affairs Detachment.)

In early March 2001, the Taliban decided to destroy all pre-Islamic statues and objects in Afghanistan. The Taliban destroyed numerous statues in the museum that survived the previous looting and destruction. The Taliban also destroyed the two giant Buddhas from the 5th century in Bamian, and other ancient historical statues in Ghazni. One of the Buddhas in Bamian was the world's tallest-standing Buddha.

leased was a busy one for Worley.

He is gearing for a summer on the road that will promote his new album which will be called, "Have You Forgotten?"

Just two days earlier, Worley had been featured in "USA Today" and that same morning he did a live interview on NBC's "Today Show." Later in the evening, he was scheduled to appear with Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist at a Nashville pro-America rally.

Worley worked his way into the industry playing in bars and honky tonks on weekends while working jobs ranging from a contractor to a school teacher. The Savannah, Tenn., native burst onto the country music scene in 2001 with the release of his debut album, "Hard Rain Don't Last."

The album netted the 6-foot-6 Worley a Top 10 single, "Good Day To Run," while three other singles got extensive airplay.

Last year, Worley scored his first No. 1 single with the title cut from his current album, "I Miss My Friend."

The trip to Afghanistan was just the latest in Worley's association with the U.S. Army.

In June 2001, Worley and fellow country music singer Craig Morgan performed tandem jumps with the Army's Golden Knights at Fort Campbell, Ky. The pair also impressed soldiers at Fort Campbell's Sabalauski Air Assault School with their agility on the school's obstacle course.

"I had forgotten about that," Worley laughingly recalled. "Where I come from, we do that kind of stuff for fun."

Worley has also visited Army recruiters in central Kentucky where he recorded a public service announcement.

After returning from Afghanistan, Worley debuted "Have You Forgotten?" on WSM-AM radio's "Grand Ole Opry" broadcast.

The response was immediate from both the crowds and the Opry's huge radio and Internet audience.

"He hit a chord with the song," said a WSM staff member. "We got calls immediately requesting we play the record and people wanted to know where they could buy it. It's gotten a tremendous response."

Radio around the nation has similarly responded, according to Scott Borchetta, DreamWorks' senior executive of promotions and artist development. He predicted the single could be a Top 20 song during its first full week of release.

"It's extremely rare these days," Borchetta explained. "They are treating this like a superstar release. "This is extremely huge."

While some stations have given the label negative feedback, Borchetta said the overwhelming majority of feedback has been enthusiastic. A music industry veteran, he likened the record's response to chart-toppers from the past by the likes of George Strait, Reba McEntyre and Toby Keith.

"The kind of airplay we are getting immediately is unbelievable," Borchetta said.

There's a reason for the impassioned response, Borchetta said.

"One of the reasons the song is so captivating is that it conjures up how people felt on 9/11 right up front and center," Borchetta said. "It was crystal clear when they saw those planes going into the building.

"It's like, 'Hey guys this wasn't just movie-of-the-week stuff.' It really choked a lot of people up."

Worley was philosophical when acknowledging the furor "Have You Forgotten?" could bring.

"If this were to end my career and I had to go back home and build houses, what a way to go out," Worley said. "If I go out standing up for the people who make this country what it is, that suits me fine.

"I don't have any fear, though, because I have confidence in this nation."

No army will become an effective fighting force until the soldiers in that army become a team. Every commander faces the task of forging a group of individuals with different backgrounds, different temperaments, and different skills into a single fighting unit with common objective.

In I Thessalonians, Paul describes a model fighting unit of the royal army and gives some instructions for creating an effective local church. The model he points to is the Thessalonian Church.

Paul's first contact with the Thessalonians was brief.

Acts 17 tells us that the opposition to Paul's ministry in Thessalonica was so intense; the hatred for him was so great that he had to be smuggled out of the city. Though he was able to stay less than three months, Paul left behind a strong, motivated local church. Because he could not return to the city, he wrote what we would call an underground letter to these young believers. In 1 Thessalonians, Paul challenges them to continue in the truth that he had established, and he reviews at least 11 major doctrines that he had been able to teach these hungry people in the short time he was there.

These 11 major doctrines are organized under three categories: Esprit de corps — team spirit — should be the hallmark of the army of God.

Paul had just reminded the Thessalonian believers that they were involved in spiritual warfare (I Thess. 5:8-9). Respect for authority and leadership in the local church, exercise of authority, code of honor, is the foundation of an effective unit, a local body of Christ from many individuals. Paul has given us these requirements for forging a team.

Come for an honest, open discussion about whether or not this can be established, 1130Z Tuesday at the Coalition Task Force-82 administrative building.

Who's been hooking up with Britney?

If the variety of producers she's working with is any indication, Britney Spears' next record will be her most adventurous yet.

Sure, mainstays Rodney Jerkins and the Neptunes are again logging time with the pop princess, but she has also recorded with Ashanti producer 7 Aurelius and the Matrix, the production team behind Avril Lavigne's hit singles. And don't forget Fred Durst.

Both 7, who also worked on the latest Tupac album, and the Matrix have done three tracks with Spears and are hoping to do more.

"I'm doing something for her, something really ridiculous. [A] record I'm going to do for Britney is going to give Justin a reason to cry," Aurelius said, suggesting a song that answers Timberlake's "Cry Me a River," which is widely believed to be about Spears.

Fred Durst, Jay-Z Get 'Rebellious' on new studio track

Jay-Z, who's collaborated with nearly every big name in music — from Beyoncé and Foxy to Beanie and Biggie — has added another team effort to his repertoire. The Roc-A-Fella rapper hit a New York studio on Tuesday with Fred Durst and DJ Lethal of Limp Bizkit.

Durst is thinking about calling the track "Rebels," according to a post on the Bizkit Web site, www.limpbizkit.com. It's not yet known where, when or how the result of the collaboration will surface — if at all. A previous Bizkit collabo, with Eminem on a cover of Loverboy's "Turn Me Loose," never did, after it was purported to be a track for Limp's 1999 LP, Significant Other.

Durst was clearly impressed with Jay-Z's skills on the mic, especially Jay's gift for not writing down his lyrics before he records them.

"He is unbelievable!" Durst informed his fans on the Web site. "He didn't write down one single word. (sic)."

Meanwhile, Durst is still deciding on the first single for Bipolar, which is being mixed for a May 13 release date.

Linkin Park expand Meteora's musical horizons

Linkin Park's debut album, Hybrid Theory, was the top-selling album of 2001, yet the rap-metal group never reached No. 1 on the Billboard albums chart. The group's second studio disc, Meteora, which comes out March 25, just might remedy that.

The record's first single, "Somewhere I Belong," is already getting strong radio play. Meteora could be just the prodding the tired metal genre needs to generate renewed audience interest.

AI, tight defense give Sixers déjà vu

ESPN — If ever there was a matchup of two teams that mirrored each other's seasons, it is tonight's game between the resurgent Seattle SuperSonics and the even more resurgent Philadelphia 76ers.

Both teams got off to incredible starts: The Sonics 8-2, the Sixers 15-4. The coaches of both teams at the time warily claimed that the quick starts were, in the words of Sixers coach/head case Larry Brown, "fool's gold." And both teams went out and proved the cynics correct by having swoons that made many wonder whether they could even make the playoffs.

Well, the Sonics, even with the subtraction of the overbearing Gary Payton and the addition of Ray Allen, who has blown into town like a storm that carries away with it a dark cloud, probably are not going to be postseason bound in the uber-competitive Western Conference.

But the Sixers, who went from 15-4, then lost 20 of their next 30 games to hover around .500, now have won 10 of their past 11 to not only jet to 35-25. Philly can begin talking about not only winning a division, but winning the entire conference. After all, they are only 2½ games out of first place in the East as the Nets, Pistons and Pacers lose, lose and lose some more.

Seattle's downfall had depth that few can touch on or care to discuss because of the implications involving Payton. But Philadelphia's dive, while always having something to do with the inner workings of Allen Iverson, also involved the ongoing medical updates of Todd MacCulloch, Aaron McKie, Monty Williams, Derrick Coleman, et al.

After a while, the mercurial Brown even went through a bout of "Should I stay or should I go?" Those who follow the team closely never took Brown's idle musings of retirement seriously, because Brown is one of the most knee-jerk reactionists around. The thing that everybody says about Brown is that after every game, win or lose, he comes into the coach's office and wants to trade whichever player performed poorly that evening.

AI shoots 20 percent? See ya.

Eric Snow misses a key jump shot? Gone.

Keith Van Horn played soft defense and gave up 25 points? Go get a NBDL player who has more guts.

Just like he did two years ago, Allen Iverson is taking the ball to the hole.

The next day, of course, Brown settles down and goes back to work with the same players he just wanted to deal, and that is one of the reasons the Sixers are streaking right now, including an 88-60 victory over the Portland Trail Blazers on Thursday night.

West's best wild on getting to Finals

ESPN — It was the very definition of poignant. There sat Kevin Garnett, exhausted, his backside aching, his ankle throbbing, all alone in a foreign locker room, no coaches, no teammates, no trainers, trying to will himself to face the next challenge, the next battle, knowing that he will have to have more nights like this one if his Minnesota Timberwolves are going to have any chance.

Twenty-five points.

Twenty-four rebounds.

Fifty minutes. On the second night of a back-to-backer.

Loss.

Minutes earlier, he had embraced Chris Webber, with whom he'd battled for most of those 50 minutes, whose own ankle is still terribly swollen, who is going out there every night for the Kings at around 70 percent, unable to elevate, instead of taking a night off. Because it's that time of year.

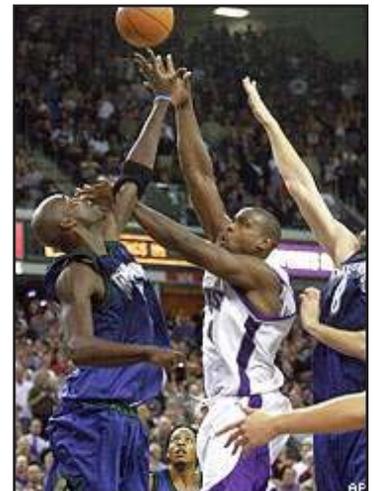

"My coach asked me if I was OK, and I said, 'Yeah,' and he said 'Are you lying to me?'" and I had to lie to him," Webber said.

Win.

This is the Western Conference. In the last two weeks, I have seen just about all of the contenders to the throne: the Mavericks, Spurs, Kings, Timberwolves and Jazz. In 15 years of covering hoop, I have never seen competition like this. Never seen so many superstars excelling nightly. Never seen so many worthy teams that are laying it on the line. Everyone believes the Lakers are vulnerable, and everyone is hungry. Everyone is desperate to get what Shaquille O'Neal and Kobe Bryant have.

"I would love another shot at them," Duncan said of his Southern California tormentors.

The west is full of dominant players, like Duncan, with his arsenal of drop steps and reverse pivots. There is Webber, now a complete player, demanding the ball in the low box and converting time and time again, defending the low post with honor and passion. There is Garnett, all over the floor, scoring from the wings, the key, the post, grabbing board after board, snuffing drives to the hole. There is Nowitzki, dropping rainbows from the sky. Maybe he's a step behind (and, by extension, so may be the Mavericks), but he's learning quickly (and so are they). There is the old guard, Stockton to Malone, who simply will not leave the stage.

But you can't win out here without a fully functional team, one that can defend as well as score.

The Spurs have reinvented themselves on the fly. While they still will pound the ball inside to Duncan, they now can get out and run. Really run. Tony Parker is eerily reminiscent of a young Kevin Johnson; no one in the league is quicker from point A to point B with the ball, and that includes Allen Iverson. Stephen Jackson and Manu Ginobili make San Antonio, egads, athletic, running the wings, getting offense off their defense.

"We're good at scrambling," Jackson said. "In the past years, it's been pass the ball into Tim, and everybody else sits and watches. But this year we've got guys who can create. We've got slashers now. We can play off of Tim. And it's helping Tim a lot. It definitely makes it easier for him when you've got other guys who can score and take the pressure off."
